

We are lucky to have had Abhijit, as a one-man design army, during the early days of our company's journey. He came on-board as an intern, amidst a wave of hiring. Even as an intern, he held his own in a highly unstructured work environment.

He delivered brilliantly (and single-handedly) in his internship project ("website builder"). This project opened-up a new direction for our product's evolution in the coming months. In fact, his performance was so good, that we gave him a raise in the middle of the internship itself.

After his internship, spent two more years with us, where he delivered multiple critical projects, mostly independently.

More recently, he took the initiative of hiring and mentoring an intern from his alma-mater, and yet again, did a fabulous job of this. Along with the intern, he has delivered another critical project, which, based on initial customer feedback, our customers can't wait to get their hands on!

Abhijit, has a level head on very young shoulders. I wouldn't be surprised, if people mistake him to be professionally far more experienced than what the number of years on his resume indicate.

I personally wish him all the very best for wherever he goes next, and I truly believe that he will prove to be an asset on any team.
